My fear is living an average life
With average teenage girl wants and ordinary necessities for living needs Another average schedule with average friends and average friends Average love story with average breakups with average, unrealistic goals Slightly above average intelligence with gaps and holes.
Maybe my greatest fear is blending in:
Being predictable,
Throwing up clichés
So unoriginal, it's completely inexplicable.
Or quite possibly my greatest fear is being standard
To the point where I'm indistinguishable in the giant crowd Always asking the easy way out Instead of letting my ideas stand proud.
Sometimes my efforts to be creative go to waste I try too hard to be unique to the point where it kills me to feel I am not qualified for what I seek like a meaningless bubble in a huge fishbowl,
I fear my identity fading away
Being forgotten and growing old.
You're told all your life that you're special and one of a kind Yet I feel like an average girl living with my intentions blind Average thoughts and Average features, all in all I want to be that girl that changes your life

I want to be that girl who you call
The one who shapes you
In the best and worst form Conformity is just another comfort zone and I'm afraid I'll be trapped forever in the norm Normality may be a paved road to take, the comfortable path to walk down, But flowers do not grow in the dark, they will never wake
My greatest fear is that I will not bloom
And become insignificant, irrelevant to my world, be a victim of life's potential doom An average life
Can be boring and disappointing
But an unforgettable life?
That takes a lot of revolting
I fear being average, I fear being normal Never be normal or predictable, you see Because normal people scare me.
